It has no fixed coordinates on any latitude and contains a vast amount of molecular oxygen, carbon dioxide and nitrogen. Stratosphere The upper stratosphere is the lowest layer of the stratosphere. It extends from the tropopause, which is the boundary of the troposphere and stratosphere, to altitudes where the air is too cold for the adiabatic lapse rate to occur. Above this region, and below the tropopause, is the lower stratosphere. Above the tropopause is the mesosphere, and above this is the thermosphere. All parts of the stratosphere are relatively thick compared to their density, with the exception of the aurora. At the tropopause, the atmospheric pressure is equal to the surface pressure, but further up, it is lower. Mesosphere The mesosphere is the layer of the stratosphere located between the tropopause and the stratopause. As it is the lowest part of the stratosphere, it is the warmest and is characterized by the presence of hydrogen chloride. It has a temperature higher than the tropopause and a lower temperature than the stratopause. The mesosphere is the least dense of the stratospheric layers, and its thickness ranges between at 70-90° latitudes and over over the polar regions. Thermosphere The thermosphere is the layer of the stratosphere extending from the stratopause to altitudes where the escape velocity is higher than the average orbital speed of the planet
